Workshop Summary:

Danger automatically triggers survival mode reactions (fight, flight, and freeze). Divorce, as one of the major traumatic life experiences, often triggers the client's most primitive survival instincts. Moreover, the interaction with the clients might press the team members' "red buttons" and trigger in us a survival reaction as well.

What happens to us when we approach peacemaking processes from a reactive, survival point of view? How does our culture and collective social memory trigger our survival instincts? In this interactive workshop we will learn to identify survival voices.

Role plays, self-reflections, small and large group discussions, music and more surprises will help us through this journey.

We will explore ways of uncovering, as well as creating, receptive places within our clients and within ourselves.

We will discuss letting go in order to gain positive control; the dance between mind and heart and collaborating within one's self.

We will explore together the choices we make, and offer learning tools such as the "Johari window", self-reflection and the power of intentional thinking in order to create a strong vision for change.

"The content of the program blew me away. The presenters connected me with my clients in ways I had never thought about before. They challenged the audience to face tough subjects and ultimately, I think it was very, very useful in helping to understand how we can serve our clients."

"This was an outstanding presentation in every way."

"The notion of moving from Survival Mode to Reception Mode is original and interesting and applies to our work in very real ways. Would love to see more of them!"

"Absolutely wonderful. Very powerful—and seemed to bring everyone in the room to an engaged and thoughtful place."

"Great program... excellent... informative and I hope of great assistance in improving how I relate to clients and the team."

"Phenomenal course."

"Excellent."
